

A Notebook

Michael E. Stone

The famous paperless office isn't, and stationery shops have become mini computer stores with a few school notebooks and crayons. apologies for what they once were.

I wanted a good notebook to write in with my fountain pen, without the ink bleeding through and ghosting on the other side or staining paper veins around letters.

Not for ballpoint or roller ball, or gel or felt or any other such,
but for a pen, ink and gold nib.
One of writing's pleasures, a once modern replacement for an iron nib and an inkwell.

I found a foolscap, graph-ruled, black-boarded note book. The only one with polished paper for writing, for writing over and under and polishing.
for crossing out, writing above and correcting.

It had black covers and a spiral, not bound. But that's a small concession to make for paper and pen and nib,
and ink that does not bleed, through one side of life to another.

SpeedPoets April 2010