

ararat

A QUARTERLY VOL. XLI SUMMER 2000 No. 163

$24.00 A YEAR $7.00 AN ISSUE

Six Poems

by Michael E. Stone

ARAGATS

Masis from Aragats is scarce seen, hidden by high day's haze.

Below, between, shining flashes off tin roofs, Ararat's rich plain tween the two mountains.

There is much on Aragats.

We pass long empty villages, turns marked white on the black tarred road.

Above the trees, Ambert's black bastion bulging outward towers, broken, broken open.

Beyond, a church's path beaoning beflagged bushes burning with faith and yellow rosehips. Deep green gorges, and the bluish plain glimpsing through haze below.

On to the top! High mountain pastures with nomad herders; electric pylons' horizontal scars cut green hills, valleys' folds gouged by snow-melt's rock dregs, dotted with flocks.

At the round blue cold crater lake below the peak thin air, heart beats; a bus turned coffee house shouting Coca Cola red discord; a heap of rubbish on a hairpin bend. Height's cool; birds of prey hanging still in the air.

And then down, down to the plain again.

GOSHAVANK

An upper storey reaching wooden ramp like a pictured ziggurat building (was it done so?). This time's renovation, abandoned for a moment.

Within, tenebrous tremendum of sculpture of space; a polygon drum playing God's tune with torque and tower.

Mexitar's students' voices sounding in still memory but dead, and learning is dead.

An outside wall, a delicate decorative wall, with false and arched deepset windows.

HAGHARTZIN

Dank dark soil, seated on rocks in the holy grove of overhanging green.

Eating on the green high place with three xachars sooted; yellow candle drippings fluttering lit by Tigran's lighter and a tree with votive rags. Old sanctity and damp humus.

Sausage pink, round brown bread flat scored on a flat mossy stone white-yellow village cheese, outside smooth and inside pumiced.

Like us.

MASIS FROM THE ARARAT PLAIN

Through the plain of Ararat it takes an hour to drive from one side of Masis to the other. It looks, this clichéd wonder; always there and over there.

A plain with cows, yellowed hay stretching to the mountain's foot in another country.

Green stripped watermelons, summer's wintery ones, heaped up at the roadside.

The Ark stopped there, at Ichevan's otevan, descent's khan.

Late afternoon's sun sends seen rays through haze on the mountain's shoulder like a Netherlandish painting.

Did Noah drink the wine of Areni? He would have had to walk a bit. Perhaps he tired and fell asleep and look what happened!

SEVAN FROM THE NORTH

The Dilichan road winds up the mountain;
lips of green thick forest curling back from the road's
sharp tooth.
A roadside oasis;
spring water forced freezing into pipe.
A palm across the pipe's end and cold water arcs into
dry throat,
but the palm is cold, very cold.
A gas driven truck, its flatbed lying on metal bottles
and the driver drinks.
A soldier too.

Then on up, beyond the tree-line,
yellow field's hay heaps newly hoarded
and dung patties heat drying for the winter warmth.

I saw a vision on the crest between yellow and blue,
between sleep and waking; or is it truly waking?
With blue Sevan fading off into mist ahead;
the promontory (once island),
domes and drums scarce seen
and incense lingering as the song of service fades.
And Noratuz
a petrified harvest of stone memories.

Sevan, Kegham's lake,
Bluer than Galilee, turquoise like Hawaii's crater,
darker patches like weathered skin; bigger too.
Here and there merge.

The past burns through their convex glass,
I'm at its focal point that blinds the eye.
Now and then merge.

EGHEGNATZOR

High cliffs along the valley;
The silk road guarded by a fort;
A city's ruins;
An open church on the cliff's shoulder
for dead sentries who patrolled the ridge

Half-way up, a mule trail
To crumbled monastery walls,
Ruined cells.

Across the river, a graveyard.
Rounded, long stones most buried in the ground.
Some with ancient Hebrew on them,
mute memories of a forgotten exile.
The monastery opposite and the river.

An old, bent man came,
"these stones are from another age" he said.

They are all still there:
They Jews of that village,
The caravans of the Asia merchants,
The monks,
The guards along the crenellated ridge.

Now a wedding feast in a village,
Long tables of food and people,
Talking, living.

We ate there,
on a platform
hanging over the water like the willow branches.
And drank coffee.